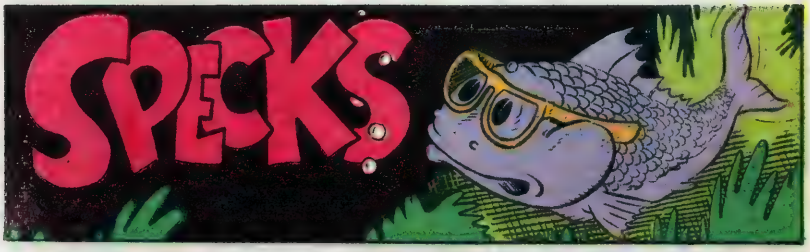
POPEYE, KIN I HAVE A NICKEL TO BUY A LOLLIPOP?



George started out his fish life like any other fresh water fish. He was hatched, ate a lot, and grew up to be the kind of fish that any fisherman would be proud to pop into a frying pan. He led a regular fish life until his fifth birthday. On that day his whole life took a change.

The trouble started—as it usually does with a fish—with a fisherman. This man discovered the pool George lived in and decided to try his luck at fishing there. The man was new at the sport and unfamiliar with the dangers of moss covered stones. He studied the pool and decided the right place to fish was in the center where the water was deep. But to reach the deep water he had to walk across the tops of several stones—stones which were covered with moss. He did quite well until he reached the stone that George was sleeping under. This stone was covered with moss and when his foot came down on it—ZOOOOP—out the foot shot and the man landed on his back in the water.

The large splash startled George and he shot out from under the rock, heading for deep water. As luck would have it, the fisherman's glasses had fallen off and were sinking in the water right in the path of the onrushing fish.

The fish and the glasses came together and in one short moment George became the first fish in history to wear glasses. Everything might have been okay if the glasses had been made for George, but the man who lost them had very weak eyes and everything George saw became huge because of the magnification.

At first George was afraid of everything he saw. The little baby fish that used to run from him now caused him to run. The tiniest thing became a monster through the glasses. It was bad enough being afraid, but that didn't really hurt him. The very dangerous result of the glasses was that George had such a terrible time finding enough to eat. The bugs that had made up his diet he now passed by as being much too big for him to swallow. He would spend hours trying to fill his tummy with little tiny bits of food. It took thousands and thousands of these little bites to make a meal. This took so much energy to hunt for them that every night poor George went to bed hungry. There just wasn't enough time in the day for him to get a fish-sized meal.

With the shortage of food plus all of the extra exercise, the poor fish got thinner and thinner. No longer was he the big fish in the puddle. He was long enough, but there wasn't enough meat on him to make a meal for a baby kitten.

Who knows what would have been the end of George if some men hadn't come along and decided to net out all of the fish in the pond. George was so thin that he didn't get caught in the net until the very last try. When the men pulled in the net with George in it, they took one look at the poor fish and knowing that they couldn't sell such a thin fish, tossed him back into the pond.

So you see, the glasses really saved George's life. If he had been fat he would have been cooked, which goes to prove that wearing glasses isn't so bad—that is, if you're a fish. Oh, what happened to George? Well, when the man threw him back into the pond he hit a moss covered rock and the glasses fell off. George has been eating well ever since.
